MEMORANDUM FOR: Executive Director-Comptroller

Colonel White:

You asked why we didn't update the titles in [redacted] when we reprinted it to put [redacted] on a separate page.

STAT

[redacted] was substantially revised and fully coordinated. In the process it was reduced from more than two pages to less than one. Since the old [redacted] began on the last page of [redacted] we had to reprint that page or hold [redacted] could be revised.

STAT

If we had revised [redacted] to make the titles current, we would have had to show a current date of revision; and it would have been necessary to coordinate the proposal. Reissuing [redacted] with a current date and new titles would have given the impression of current authenticity, which it doesn't have, and would have conflicted with the processing of a proposed revision of [redacted] issues about which are currently being negotiated between the Intelligence Directorate and the Clandestine Service. We do not have a forecast from the Intelligence Directorate about when this revision may be ready for processing.

STAT

Rather than hold [redacted] indefinitely, we felt that it would be better to publish it and reprint the last page of [redacted] as is, continuing to show the September 1963 date of its last revision.

STAT

This mechanical awkwardness could be reduced if we began each regulation on a new page. This would introduce a lot of blank white spaces into regulations and expand their volume probably by as much as 25-35 per cent. The practice has been to try to adapt to the occasional mechanical problem rather than introduce a substantial change in the format of the regulations.

If we have become so lurecative that we can't choose a title which is out of date by a year or two without a full coordinating process, then we are in bad shape indeed. One short of don't swallow
any part of this argument
as far as it attempts to explain why you didn't use Current and officially Approved titles.
